She's never really got the concept of half-feelings, Deb. I turn away, irritated, and shoot 'Of course you should go' over my shoulder as I stare vaguely at the contents of the fridge.

'If you need me here, you know I'll stay,' she says.

I glance back at her. Her expression is totally open. It's impossible to stay irritated with Deb. She's just got someplace else she wants to be, and in her head, why would that affect me unless I needed her here?

'No, you go,' I say, closing the fridge. 'Find yourself a sexy French hippy.'

We pause again. Upstairs our solo guest has walked out of the kitchen and on to the terrace. He's speaking. Muttering. I can't quite catch the words.

'Is he talking to himself?' Deb asks, tilting her head. 'Maybe a madman's found his way in. Maybe we've got a squatter.'

I move closer to the door to our flat and crack it open. The villa's built on a hill – our door is tucked away to the right of the building, hidden from view under the walkway that leads from the kitchen to the raised terrace with its infinity pool.

The author way of developing the characters is very impressive and her characters are well drawn and compelling. It is a unique novel in many ways, and yet, of course, its themes are universal.
